Farmer & Giant ~~~~~

/When he was young Phaedrus used to think about cows and pigs and chickens and how they never knew that the nice farmer who provided food and shelter was doing so only so that he could sell them to be killed and eaten. [...]/

/He also used to wonder if there was a higher farmer that did the same thing to people, a different kind of organism that they saw every day and thought of as beneficial, providing food and shelter and protection from enemies, but an organism that secretly was raising these people for its own sustenance [...]/ (p. 248)

/A metaphysics of substance makes us to think that all evolution stop with the highest evolved substance, the physical body of man. It makes us to think that cities and societies and thought structures are all subordinate creations of this physical body of man. [...] If you follow that fallacy long enough you come out with the conclusion that individual electrons contain the intelligence needed to build New York City all by themselves.[...]/ (p. 249)

/If it's possible to imagine two red blood cells sitting side by side asking, "Will there ever be a higher form of evolution than us?" and looking around and seeing nothing, deciding there isn't, then you can image the ridiculousness of two people walking down a street of Manhattan asking if there will ever be any form of evolution higher than "man," meaning biological man./ (p. 250)

/How do tell the saviors from the degenerates? Particularly when they look alike, talk alike and break all the rules alike?/ (p. 256)
